me, documenting my everyday life in the big fashion capitals, etc. The page was created out of pure love for fashion and my never-ending curiosity and in parallel to my life as a designer. This was an experience that opened my perspective and freed me. The blog opened new horizons for me like curating fashion in museums, writing for magazines, photographing, and all the rest of the things my name is known for. The blog was shut down in 2014 with the rise of Instagram. It was impossible to compete.

AE: Absurdism often challenges conventional norms. How do you navigate the challenges of incorporating absurd elements into fashion without alienating the audience or losing the essence of wearability?

FM: Absurdity does exist and it's valuable because it makes people think and be more creative or even more interesting. There are numerous designers whose work confirms the necessity of suggesting something different. Take for example Comme Des Garcons, Harri, Thom Browne and previously McQueen, Galliano etc.
However, all these great designers show different things on their runway shows than what they sell at their showrooms. These absurd clothes make headlines and maintain a designer's reputation through fashion exhibitions, fashion editorials, celebrities while they are sold for very high prices to private collectors and institutions. It's a win-win situation.

AE: To you, are absurd outfits presented on fashion shows an act of crossing conventional norms or just playing childish or something third?

FM: It really depends on the message the designer wants to put out and how well it is communicated with the audience. A fashion show serves as the bridge between the brand and its guests (journalists, celebrities, fans) and less with the buyers of the collection. It's about the image and usually a very strong communication trick that will elongate the memory of the show, either be it a celebrity model, a live orchestra, a special performance, the location etc.

AE: What challenges have you faced in your career, and how have they contributed to your growth as a creative professional?

FM: I had to restart my life from scratch twice, which enabled me to test my limits. It helped me understand who I really am. I don't understand challenges, I don't see life as something challenging or something to worry too much about.

AE: Are there personal experiences or values that you bring into your professional work, and if so, how do they manifest?

FM: I try to be honest and change only the things I can. The more I grow the more I accept that the world is not perfect yet it doesn't stop me from trying for the best. Everyone becomes different with the practice of their skills.

AE: What are your aspirations for the future, both personally and professionally, within the realm of fashion and creative expression?

FM: My hope is to meet interesting people and work together on ideas that will maintain and encourage aesthetic harmony and continuous stimulation for knowledge. I am less and less interested in proving myself to anyone other than me.

IMPOSSIBLE RENDEZ - VOUS NO. 3

Coco Chanel & Benjamin Netanyahu

In a fantastical setting where time and space were mere suggestions, Coco Chanel and Benjamin Netanyahu found themselves seated in an opulent Parisian salon adorned with elegant black and white designs and the faint scent of Chanel No. 5 lingering in the air.

Drawing by Mobina Khalili

Coco Chanel: (sipping champagne) Monsieur Netanyahu, you seem a bit out of place in the world of fashion. Politics is your canvas, no?

Benjamin Netanyahu: (adjusting his suit) Mademoiselle Chanel, I'm more accustomed to negotiating alliances than discussing the latest trends.

Coco Chanel: (smirking) Ah, alliances. The ultimate accessory for a statesman. But tell me, Mr. Netanyahu, have you considered the power of a well-tailored suit as your diplomatic attire?

Benjamin Netanyahu: (raising an eyebrow) I'm more concerned with ensuring the security of my nation than the cut of my suit.

Coco Chanel: (waves a hand) Security, my dear, is a state of mind. Fashion, on the other hand, is a statement. Imagine the impact of a well-dressed diplomat.

Benjamin Netanyahu: (smirking) I prefer military intelligence over fashion intelligence.

Coco Chanel: (leaning forward) But Monsieur, style is a language. It can speak volumes without saying a word. Have you not witnessed the power of a perfectly chosen outfit?

Benjamin Netanyahu: (smiles) I've seen the power of strength and resilience. Clothes do not make a leader.

Coco Chanel: (laughs) True, but they can make a leader unforgettable. Fashion is a weapon, my dear, and I believe you would look quite dashing in a tailored ensemble.

Benjamin Netanyahu: (grinning) I'll stick to my suits of armor, Mademoiselle Chanel.

Written by AI
Edited by Aleksandra Eremashvili

As the impossible conversation unfolded, the salon transformed into a runway, and the two iconic figures found themselves in a fashion show of diplomacy and style. In this whimsical encounter, the clash between politics and fashion created a tapestry of intrigue and elegance that could only exist in the realm of the impossible.